of thousands of people lining the harbor and occupying every point of vantage. The Pacific Mall dock was the center of the throng. The only liner in port, the Peru, was lying at the Channel dock, and this gave those who sought to see all that was to be seen in harbor and channel as well ample room to hold their places, and to cry out their applause. Even the band was hidden by the crush of folk whose desire to see would not be denied. Round the Mall dock the people extended in waves, imparting color to the scene, and making the masses which rose from the water's edge as bright as ribbons, gay gowns and glaring ducks could render the sombre ship's sides and warehouse openings. The Wilder wharf had the Kinau and Claudine lying alongside and these were early crowded from the rail to the top of the house, and flaunting reds and blues told of

Jupiter Pluvius played an important part in the pleasures which went on unceasingly in the Healani and Myrtle boat houses from noon till night. When morning broke upon the harbor the region of the boat houses was gay and resplendent in a waving mass of color, blue and red predominating and interweaving in the breeze which came down the valleys and swept out to sea. The commencement of the day was propitious to a fine ending, as far as the gayety of the assembling crowds around the boat houses was concerned. But as the day wore on clouds gathered and hung over the scene, and the deluge of rain which fell upon the beautiful array of colors, causing them to hang limply, HONOLULU spent Saturday enjoying aquatic sports, and after a full day of eight hours, with every variety of entertainment that could be had on the water and in it, deserted the waterfront for the uptown diversions of dinners and theater parties, which filled the day to its close. Through all the gathering of the thousands upon the front and the vessels and craft of every description, which aided the onlookers to make a day of merriment of it, there was not a single disturbance, there was not a single case of disagreement leading to other than words reported, and the day left Honolulu the better in temper for the recurring festival.

Many a hat will be bought today which will be worn by other than the purchaser, and many a hat will not be bought, but there must be losers wherever there are men whose sympathies or ideas of form lead them to speculation upon the result of a contest. The color of the paint which covered the paintable portion of the city during the evening was the regulation red and it was administered by the men whose faith is pinned to that hue, and who wear it on every race day, but the purveyors were the bluest crowd, the adherents of that shade, which had for the observer unattached in local aquatics, double meaning on that evening.

For the Healani did not win a race. Yes, one, the four oar shell event, in which there were only two entries, and both from the Healani club. There was not a red in sight to take it away, and it is hardly probable that there would have been any other result had there been a half dozen entries, as the Healani seniors rowed a splendid event and were in form to win from anything afloat. The anarchists took the blues into camp with comparative ease, and certainly with celerity, for every thing on the program took the carnation tint. Unfortunately there was a foul and a no race decision in the main event of the day, the six-oar barge race, which must be repeated, and will be pulled off next week. Despite this marring feature of the day there was enough of closeness in the subsequent events to permit all soreness, except that felt by a few energetic partisans, to disappear. The day opened in a manner which gave promise that the weather was bound to add its share of the celebration. But always fickle it showed its feminine trait to the full at the lunch-
